CAMPS

CHOOSING THE RIGHT CAMP PROGRAM

Questions for you and your child to consider:

- What do we want from the camp?
- Do they have programs that fulfill the interest of my child?
- Does an all girls, all boys, or co-ed setting suit us best?
- What length of time suits our needs?
- What are our budget considerations?
- What costs exist beyond the basic camp fee?

Questions for the camp director:

- What is your background in camping? How many years of experience do you have as a camp director? Do you have education in child development and recreation?
- What is your camp's philosophy? Does it include a caring, well-balanced community in which a child can grow and develop?
- What is your ratio of campers to staff? Does it vary with the age level of campers, special need, and types of activities available?
- What are the ages of your counselors and what is the training they receive? (Eighteen years of age for counselors is suggested, and 15 years of age for Jr. Counselors.) Is there a background check? Does the training include education in child-development and first aid? Do they have expertise in the sport or program they will be teaching?
- What percentage of the campers return each year? (60% is the ideal, which indicates a level of camper and parent satisfaction.)
- What are the dining, living space, and health care facilities like? Do you have the ability to handle medical emergencies? Is a nurse or other medical person on staff? (Keep in mind some programs are travel/adventure programs in the wilderness or on the road.)
- What provisions are made for campers with special needs? Can you address the needs of individual children?
- What are the policies for parent communication? (Parents should be allowed to call camp anytime to get reports on their child. Children should be encouraged to write or to call during a specific time each week.) How is homesickness handled?

Ask for references.

Most camps willingly provide the names and phone numbers of alumni families.
